North American markets stalled in Q3 as easy year-over-year comparable second quarter reports gave way to tougher guides going forward. Exacerbating matters, valuations are nearing all-time highs at a time when there are fears that interest rates are showing more potential to increase vs decrease going forward. The market doesn't seem to be anticipating an inevitable return to normalcy, but that doesn't mean there aren't a lot of opportunities in a wildly divergent market; it just means that security selection and "special situations" will likely be key to better performance going forward.

The Global Supply Chain has gone from relative obscurity to front-and-center on investors' minds this year. Manufacturing shortages, employee shortages and transportation cost inflation have been dominant themes over the last few months. Homebuilders are lowering forecasts because they can't find enough materials coming from overseas or trades to complete projects, while buyers are shunning low supply induced higher prices we have seen over the last year. Furniture and clothing manufactures are having difficulties getting enough product manufactured in China and Vietnam amid renewed lockdowns. Every importer is talking about containership rates being up 100%+ year over year while trucking companies are maintaining forecasts for elevated rates through mid-2022. Even the recent run-up in the energy complex is more related to supply constraints than to demand factors (demand is obviously up year over year as it is with everything, but just-in-time supply ramps have failed to get back to historical levels, although rig counts are moving higher). There will be some surprise beneficiaries of the supply chain choke-off, notably those that came into the back half of the year over-inventoried and who will likely offer less discounting than usual into the holidays.

Of course, the flip side of the supply equation is demand; is the demand really there? Most companies as varied as car dealerships, homebuilders, shoe manufacturers and furniture companies, to name a few industries, say it is. The truth is harder to determine. If you can only supply 80% of your old capacity, and backlogs on orders or projects that started last year are keeping you busy, it probably looks like demand is strong even though it is tough to tell. A person's decision to build a house twelve months ago is still creating demand for appliances, furniture, and plumbing long after that person's demand for a new house has been satisfied. Our personal belief is that supply chain related long backlogs are potentially hiding the deteriorating demand that is showing up in economic data.

VENATOR ALTERNATIVE INCOME FUND REVIEW

The Income Strategy has had a good year so far, outperforming its underlying yield in a tight yield environment. It has benefited from its exposure to the convertible bond market, as well as a refinancing cycle that had seen several investments “called” away from us before maturity. Most of our bonds are now invested in the convertible space, and half of these companies have net cash on their balance sheet. We will continue to favor this type of instrument until we find better opportunities in traditional bonds, which currently don’t carry enough return yield in today’s market environment to compensate for the risk. Currently, the fund is carrying an underlying yield of just over 5% with maturities largely huddled in the 2025-2026 timeframe.

VENATOR FOUNDERS FUND REVIEW

Our Founders Fund was unable to recover from its July swoon and sits approximately 5% below its all-time high watermark. We were very pleased with the Q2 financial results of nearly all our investments in both absolute terms as well relative to expectations. With few exceptions in consumer products, we are positioned away from companies with supply chain issues. We continue to favor longer term unappreciated secular trends and have bought several new positions to that effect such as ZipRecruiter which should benefit from an influx of people returning to work, a shift online for recruiting, a recent trend of people looking to switch careers, and a recent factor of companies finding themselves short-staffed in a rebuilding economy. We believe that our investments will be near term beneficiaries of the supply chain issues noted above as they are benefiting from strong inventory positions near term and improving secular trends long term, all at what we view to be undemanding valuations and substantial upside.
